Excerpt: .Two or three short subjects. periods of study may be allowed in the pro gramme for all the pupils to study and for individual pupils to go to the teacher for assistance, always in a way so as not to attract attention. In graded schools two or three study periods of twenty-five or thirty minutes each may be secured by dividing the class iuto two sections, one section reciting while the-other is studying. In such studies as writing, drawing, language, . and elementary science all the pupils of a class may recite together, but in other subjects the division of a class may be made with advantage on account of more fully reaching the needs of individual pupils, besides affording greater opportunity for study. In the lower grades the school or class may be divided into three or four sections, the pupils at the seats being given written and other wort of various kinds. In those graded schools whose plan of classification embodies the idea of short intervals between classes and frequent promotions there will of course be no difficulty in giving pupils ample opportunity for study. Two or more classes in a room will be heard separately in all-sequential subjects such as arithmetic, grammar, and See pages 126-133. Advantage of short intervals between class. elementary reading, thus giving pupils at least a third of the school time to silent reading or study. In ungraded schools care should be taken lest the number of classes...
