Excerpt: . men heard of a death by intemperance, or by lightning, it was with similar emotions. They saw no way of averting the fatal necessity. The credence of the many had called alcohol a luxury, and the coincidence between faith and practice was complete. That reform had not yet been inaugurated, that has since gladdened so many homes, and lighted beacons to guide the young past the breakers of dissipation. An occasional warning would be given, but the true remedy was not seen. The clergyman, who should have pointed out the woes of the drunkard's life, was himself a victim. The teacher, who should have guided his pupils along the sunny path of healthful Temperance, was whelmed in the malstrom of excess. The press that has since scattered so many facts, God's hand-writing against iniquity, was then silent, or the medium of...
