A perpetual blight would follow him; he would feel himself an outcast. The more equitable were his claims, the more acute would be his sense of the wretched figure he made in his own eyes. He would hate the world; he would be dissatisfied with himself; he would fly into the most impenetrable retreat, that so he might be concealed from the scorn of the multitude. No, said Cloudesley to himself with unalterable firmness: my beloved Julian shall never be an adventurer. But what reason had Cloudesley to anticipate an unsuccessful issue He knew that he had a tale to tell, full of truth, full of power, capable, it may be, of carrying conviction to every unprejudiced mind. But it is not thus, that the graver affairs of this world, as they are called, are settled. Cloudesley knew that world. He had perhaps no proofs to adduce, that, in a court of law, could put down the formal attestations with which I was furnished. Then, in a court of law, money is every thing. It is no trifling undertaking, to thrust from his place a nobleman, whose title is already authentically recorded, and who has been admitted to the possession of the estates and the income annexed to that tide. What a delightful resource is to be found in the procrastination of the law, where the steps to be multiplied in behalf of the rich man are eternal, and every step requires all but the purse...
